I am delighted to share this year’s annual report with you. This has been a period of tremendous growth and success for the Libraries, as we build on the strong foundations we’ve laid over the past several years. The theme of this report is “frontiers,” and the idea of pushing boundaries and exploring new opportunities rings true throughout. Within these pages, you will encounter stories of innovative services, creative programs, and bold new partnerships.

Thank you for your interest in our work as we continue to make Rutgers a better place to research, teach, and learn. As always, if you have any questions or feedback about the Libraries, please feel free to contact me.

Krisellen Maloney
Vice President for Information Services and University Librarian
Improving with Your Feedback

In 2016, we conducted the first iteration of LibQUAL+, our universitywide quality improvement survey. This past spring, we held our first follow-up survey, and we were delighted with the results, which show demonstrable improvement in each area measured.

The most improved dimension of our service was information control, which measures our collections and how easily users can obtain the information they need. Resources falling under this umbrella include the QuickSearch platform, our print and electronic collections, and our website.

Affect of service also had positive scores, with our personnel earning full marks for their courtesy and willingness to give users individualized attention.

For library as place, scores showed that our spaces inspire study and learning—but that there’s room for improvement when it comes to providing enough seating and the right mix of quiet and collaborative spaces. We’ve heard this feedback loud and clear and will keep working to better meet our users’ needs in this area.

Overall, we’re incredibly happy to see these positive results, but that doesn’t mean there isn’t work left to be done. Now that we have more data to act upon, we will continue to improve based on feedback to ensure that our users have access to world-class library services befitting a world-class research institution. Thank you for keeping us accountable!
New Online Resources

A major acquisition for us this year was three new sets of backfiles in Web of Science: Science Citation Index Expanded Backfile, Social Sciences Citation Index Backfile, and Arts & Humanities Citation Index Backfile. We now provide access to Science Citation Index Expanded and Social Sciences Citation Index from 1900 to the present, and Arts & Humanities Citation Index from 1975 to the present.

Moreover, through a transformative purchase via our membership in the Pennsylvania Academic Library Consortium (PALCI), we have acquired all the Oxford University Press ebooks published on the Oxford Scholarship Online platform, including the complete backlist and all frontlist titles through 2022. The collection currently includes over 16,000 ebooks—a number that will only continue to grow.

Digital Collections Portal

Our new digital collections portal provides online access to completed digitization projects, including Rutgers in the First World War, the Robert Moevs Archive, and the Newark Celebration 350 collection. Explore them all at collections.libraries.rutgers.edu.
Expanding Our Chat Service

This year, we made two major changes to the chat service delivered via our website, both of which have been received enthusiastically by the Rutgers community.

In January, we extended our chat hours to 10 a.m. to 10 p.m., seven days a week. Almost a third of all chat questions we received this year were asked during our new weekend hours.

Later, we piloted proactive chat widgets on our homepage, in QuickSearch, and in various databases. Rather than wait for a user to contact us with questions, after a set amount of time a pop-up prompts them asking if they need assistance. These widgets now account for 58.2% of our total chat traffic. What’s more, our analysis shows that a high percentage of these questions are sufficiently complex to require the assistance of an expert. This means that we’re reaching users who really need our help, but who might not otherwise ask for it. We’re delighted to provide this service and look forward to continuing in 2020.

Chat activity rose 99.3% from 2018 to 2019
More Tools for Student Success

Two new additions to our suite of online tools will enhance learning experiences for students across the university.

Library tutorials, which include video lessons and quizzes to assess understanding, introduce students to the basics of locating, evaluating, and using information. Topics include refining search results, copyright, citation styles, and more.

Instructors, on the other hand, have the option to embed content from one of four master courses directly into learning management systems like Canvas and Blackboard to seamlessly complement their teaching. These courses provide comprehensive deep-dives in information literacy, critical thinking, communication, and health science. This tool lets instructors focus precious classroom time on course material rather than research skills.

Our reading list tool, similarly, integrates easily with popular learning management systems. It allows instructors to assemble lists of electronic articles, streaming media, digitized content, and more so that students can access all their course materials in one place. Instructors enjoy greater control over the organization and display of their content, while taking the hassle out of accessing course reserves means students can spend more time focused on what really matters: learning!
The highlights collected here illustrate Paul Robeson Library’s commitment to supporting the university’s mission by enhancing research and learning at Rutgers–Camden. This year, we embarked on new initiatives and continued building partnerships that demonstrate both traditional and novel approaches. We aimed to reduce barriers to access, build critical research skills, and support the civic engagement priorities of our campus. In everything we do, we strive to foster a culture of creativity, diversity, and innovation.

This is all just the beginning—we have already set in motion plans for new and enhanced user services and community outreach in the year to come. In the meantime, please feel free to let us know how we’re doing!

Director, Paul Robeson Library
Making A Bigger Impact

Research shows that library instruction strengthens general education outcomes. That’s why we at Robeson Library have expanded our instruction efforts in the past year, teaching more classes and reaching more students than we have before.

We provide course-based library instruction to undergraduate and graduate students, as well as a series of orientations and workshops throughout the year. We also have an especially robust partnership with the First Year Writing Program, which includes library instruction for both courses in its sequence (Composition I and Composition II).

Fighting for Affordability

The Libraries continued to support the adoption of open educational resources, with 14 Rutgers–Camden faculty winning Open and Affordable Textbooks awards this year. We’re proud to have helped save Camden students over $550,000 on the cost of course materials since 2016!
Supporting LGBTQIA+ Students

Rutgers–Camden sponsored the 11orMore Project, which is based on findings that LGBTQIA+ students do better when they can identify 11 supportive faculty or staff on campus. Many Robeson librarians participated by issuing statements of support.

Forging New Partnerships

Scholarship has shown that collaborative academic programs and services involving the library enhance student learning. To that end, Robeson Library has worked to engage library users by partnering with groups from across campus.

For instance, we hosted Student Health Services’ We HeaR U series, which provided students a number of workshops focused on topics like mindfulness and managing anxiety.

Other collaborations included student success tutoring, Office of Disability Services testing, a weekly trans/nonbinary discussion group led by the Office of Diversity and Inclusion, a PhD writing circle, and instructional design and technology open lab hours for faculty.

We are always looking for new partners, so if you have an idea for a collaboration, we’d love to hear from you.

Our Camden Local History Edit-a-Thon hosted with the Nilsa I. Cruz-Perez Library added over 700 words to Camden’s presence on Wikipedia.
Events, Exhibits, Engagement

One of our priorities for 2018–2019 was to expand our role as a collaborative partner on campus. To do this, our events planning committee organized a record number of events this year, ranging from book clubs to film screenings to therapy dog visits. Our exhibits and displays focused on topics of local significance, items from the library’s collection, and opportunities for collaboration with others in the community. These programs supplement core services by creating new ways for our users to engage with the library.

Bike Routes Make the News

Among the collections digitized by the Libraries this year was a late-1800s Philadelphia Inquirer column titled “Trips Awheel.” Penned by reporter and cycling enthusiast Alphonse Estoclet, each edition described the sights along a Philadelphia-area bicycle route, complete with a hand-drawn map and discussion of local businesses and historical sites. Imagine how delighted we were to see this collection come to life when reporter Mike Newall decided to retrace one of Estoclet’s routes for his own article in the modern-day Inquirer!
In spring 2016, Dana Library embarked on a strategic planning process from which we developed three overarching goals: innovate to support 21st-century library use; increase community engagement; and increase operational excellence, efficiency, and fiscal sustainability. The stories included here demonstrate that we have made significant strides in all these areas.

This year, in addition to beginning a major physical renovation, we also made changes to our internal structure, creating a flexible and nimble organization responsive to the needs of our user community. We have also taken a critical eye toward our collections, working to align them more closely with the university curriculum and the needs of our users. We’re incredibly proud of the progress we’ve made, but always welcome your thoughts. Please reach out with any feedback!

Consuella Askew
Director, John Cotton Dana Library
Transforming Dana Library

This past spring, Dana Library began a series of renovations that will enhance the use, effectiveness, and enjoyment of the library for decades to come. This project will create new study and learning spaces for students, facilitate ease of access to the collections and various library departments, and establish a new center to support the development of teaching faculty.

The centerpiece of the renovations is the construction on the third floor of the library, which will be built out into quiet study space for students as well as the new P3 Collaboratory for Pedagogy, Professional Development, and Publicly-Engaged Scholarship. The renovations will also enhance the library’s archives spaces, home to both the Institute of Jazz Studies and the newly established Rutgers–Newark Archives. Finally, an addition to the library including a larger stairwell and high-capacity elevator will allow for the easier flow of foot traffic, while a bold addition to the façade on the plaza side of the building will serve as an attractive campus landmark.

The construction is scheduled to be completed this spring. Stay updated at blogs.libraries.rutgers.edu/danatransformation.
New Partners, New Services

This year, we sought out opportunities to bring our resources and services to new audiences. Over the summer, we designed a Library Digital Literacy for Student Success curriculum and delivered it to Upward Bound and Cooperman Scholars students, who used iPads to learn the educational potential of common apps, apply information searching strategies, and write basic code. We worked with the Honors Living-Learning Community to integrate the library into their first-year curriculum through research support and library instruction. Newark IT supported the expansion of our technology loan service to include new laptops and iPads, while Dining Services helped us become a Raider Dollars vendor, offering users another option to pay their fees. We also launched our poster printing service for students, faculty, and staff.

TRHT Center Opens at Dana

In November, Rutgers–Newark became one of only 10 colleges and universities in the country to host a Truth, Racial Healing, and Transformation Campus Center in Dana Library, which will host public events to confront biases that exacerbate racial tension.

Preserving the Newark Story

In her role as the inaugural archivist for the Rutgers–Newark Archives at John Cotton Dana Library, Angela Lawrence is tasked with collecting materials that accurately document, preserve, and communicate Rutgers–Newark’s historical record, highlighting the university’s role as an anchor institution in its host city.

Established earlier this year, the archive paints a rich portrait of Rutgers–Newark and its community, with decades of yearbooks, student publications, administrative proceedings, artworks, and other documents.

Even in this early stage, the archive has already supported a variety of researchers, from students investigating the history of Dana Library’s architectural additions, to a political historian studying the student career of Senator Elizabeth Warren.

The collection is now available for use on site. Please contact us for an appointment!

New Jazz Finding Aids

The Institute of Jazz Studies (IJS) made major progress in making its holdings more accessible this year, with the creation of more than 200 finding aids for its archival collections. Thanks to new database software, these aids will soon be discoverable in QuickSearch for easier access.

The IJS created 200+ new finding aids this year
This has been an incredibly busy year for us at the New Brunswick Libraries. In the pages that follow, you’ll read how we’ve been working to transform our physical spaces, create innovative services, and forge meaningful partnerships within the campus community.

But these highlights are just the tip of the iceberg. After a year of surveys, interviews, and analysis, we’ve published our strategic plan for 2020–2023 with the theme of Connect, Build, Evolve: Implementing the Future Academy. I invite you to read the full report at libraries.rutgers.edu/mission to learn more about how we will empower student success, strengthen research and teaching, and build connections moving forward.

Graduate Specialist Program

Our Graduate Specialist Program, which moved from pilot to program this year, provides opportunities for graduate students to develop their skills in a variety of methodologies while working with us to deliver consulting, workshops, and training.

Marking Milestones

The New Brunswick Libraries were proud to contribute to two major milestone celebrations this year. First, as part of the campus’s centennial celebration of Paul Robeson’s (RC 1919) graduation, we mounted an exhibition in Alexander Library titled “Fight for Freedom”: Paul Robeson’s Life and Legacy. This display explored the life of one of Rutgers’ most distinguished alumni through archival records and memorabilia, highlighting his career as an actor, singer, and global activist.

Later, we helped celebrate the legacy of Rutgers football with Rutgers Football from the Vault: Celebrating 150 Years. Through archival documents, photographs, ephemera, and memorabilia, this exhibit traced the history of Rutgers football from the first game versus Princeton on November 6, 1869 through Rutgers joining the Big Ten.

Reimagining Chang Library

The Stephen and Lucy Chang Science Library was the focus of a class assignment in the School of Environmental and Biological Sciences this year, as landscape architecture students undertook a redesign of the library as a project for their Social and Cultural Aspects of Design course.

Faculty and staff in the New Brunswick Libraries assisted the students by providing background on past and current library practices, site visits, observation sessions, and classroom presentations. Based on this information and their own experiences, students proposed changes that included the installation of new furniture as well as other optimizations of the available space to better meet their needs. It was such a great opportunity for mutual engagement that a similar assignment was performed the next semester at the Art Library.

Telling Suffragists’ Stories

To commemorate the 204th birthday of women’s suffragist Cady Stanton, a Suffragist Transcribathon was hosted at Alexander Library. Students and faculty gathered to review, annotate, and transcribe scans from the personal papers of Stanton and other suffragists.
A team of New Brunswick librarians participated in an Ithaka S+R and Modern Language Association sponsored research project titled “Research Practices of Scholars in Literatures, Writing, and Cultural Studies: A Qualitative Study of Faculty at Rutgers University–New Brunswick.” Part of Ithaka’s Research Support Services program, the purpose of the research was to examine the research practices of scholars in these fields to identify the resources and services they need to be successful. Fifteen interviews with Rutgers–New Brunswick faculty were conducted and analyzed in the report, which is now available in RUcore, the institutional repository, at rucore.libraries.rutgers.edu. Rutgers was one of 13 universities “with strength in the field” to participate in the project.

The findings of the Ithaka study are freely available in RUcore, the institutional repository.

We partnered with the Livingston Alumni Association to host an event celebrating Livingston College’s 50th Anniversary at Carr Library, including an alumni panel and exhibit from the University Archives. A digital collection will be published in the spring.

Guests in attendance for the Livi @ 50 celebration at Carr Library included alumni and former faculty members.
This year was an exciting one for the Health Sciences Libraries. In a variety of ways, we focused on bringing the library closer to the communities we serve—whether physically, as in the case of our outpost in the Library of Science and Medicine, or virtually, through remote instruction sessions or online research guides, which saw significant growth in terms of reach and engagement this year.

We strive to be a critical partner in the success of RBHS students and faculty, adapting our services and resources to meet the evolving needs of our community. If there is something we can do to help you succeed in your research or teaching, please let us know. We’d love to hear from you.

Building Bridges

This year, the Health Sciences Libraries expanded our service to the RBHS community in Piscataway by establishing a service outpost within the Library of Science and Medicine on Busch campus. Located on the third floor of the library in close proximity to schools like the Ernest Mario School of Pharmacy and the Robert Wood Johnson Medical School, this space was occupied by health sciences librarians four days a week during the semester for research and reference support.

“Our goal with this initiative is to meet students where they are,” explained Victoria Wagner, associate director and medical education coordinator for the Robert Wood Johnson Library. “We want to make it easier for them to access the support and expertise they need, so what better place to set up shop than right next door?”

Librarian Victoria Wagner at the new health sciences service point in the Library of Science and Medicine.

RBHS @ LSM: By the Numbers

- 79 RBHS students & faculty provided with reference support
- 406 hours of coverage
- 14 instruction sessions
- 5 public programs and exhibits hosted
Increasing Our Reach

We expanded our instruction efforts this year, with librarian support at clinical conferences and advanced degree research support ranking among the most popular types of library instruction. The number of remote sessions delivered through platforms such as Webex and Zoom continued to rise as well. Over 400 instruction sessions were logged this year and the number of attendees across all sessions rose nearly 18 percent.

We also made steps to better integrate our health sciences research guides into courses, for instance by embedding our content into students’ academic management platform. Among our most popular guides this year were Systematic Reviews in the Health Sciences (16,033 views), EndNote Tutorial (8,411 views), and Writing Personal Statements for Health Sciences Professionals (6,243 views). We also created new guides on topics like data literacy, neurosurgery, and digital and connected health.

45% Increase in usage of health sciences research guides this year

Spotlight on BrowZine

BrowZine is our new current awareness tool that helps researchers find, read, and monitor the top scholarly journals in their fields from almost any device. It includes a personal bookshelf feature and integrates seamlessly with popular citation management software.
Systematic Reviews

Librarian support for the publication of systematic reviews—reviews that gather all the empirical evidence available to answer a specific research question—continues to be in high demand.

Through our systematic review service, librarians perform comprehensive searches of scholarly databases and grey literature, organize citations, and author the methodology section of the review. Over 12 reviews are currently in process, representing partnerships with RBHS faculty in disciplines including medicine, nursing, pharmacy, and public health. Completed reviews have been published in scholarly journals as well as repositories such as Cochrane and Joanna Briggs.

While this is labor-intensive work, we are proud to provide this valuable service to our collaborators and to help produce new scholarship. Visit our website to learn more about how we can support your next project!

Systematic reviews are situated near the top of the evidence pyramid as one of the most rigorous and comprehensive types of study design.

Scholarly Publishing Symposium

In 2018, we hosted a Scholarly Publishing Symposium as part of the RBHS Provosts Faculty Development Series to explore the complexities of the publishing process. Recordings of the event are now available at collections.libraries.rutgers.edu.
